SOUND WAVES 13

By Bill Harriman

"The drummer is an inspirer, a leader, and a prophet. The blow of the drumstick translates itself not merely into sound, but into a spiritual reverberation. The excitement we feel when we hear the drumbeat tells us this is the skeletal key that opens the door into the realm of the spirit." Mickey Hart from his book "Spirit into Sound – The Magic of Music"

For over thirty years Mickey Hart was a drummer and percussionist for the Grateful Dead. But did you know that he's the author of four books, that he has numerous solo recordings, that he's a passionate musicologist and a member of the board of trustees of the American Folklife Center at the Library of Congress? And most important, that he's a devoted family man and an all around great guy?

Always someone who is constantly looking ahead, Mickey's newest musical odyssey is called "Global Drum Project." Here he has once again teamed up with Zakir Hussain, the internationally known percussion virtuoso from India. Zakir has been a part of every one of Mickey's solo records and "Global Drum Project," which will be released in early October, is the masterpiece recording that these two percussion greats have been working towards for all these years. Also included on the disc is the Nigerian talking drum master Sikiru Adepoku along with the Puerto Rican conga, bongo, and tambale great Giovanni Hidalgo. These four men are the core of a band that is currently touring the country in what is being called a joyful celebration of percussion and rhythm. Their tour brings them to the beautiful Jorgensen Center for Performing Arts on the campus of the University of Connecticut on Friday October 12th. This phone interview took place in late August and Mickey was his usual articulate, intelligent, and passionate self!

BH – Hey Mickey how's everything?

MH – "Life is good. The rhythm is right."

BH – Do you still get excited about the release of a new CD?

MH – "You know I was just talking to my daughter about that very thing last night. It's funny you should mention it because I hadn't seen the CD until the day before yesterday. And you know, you can make the CD but once you see it with the liner notes and it all comes together in one package, it becomes very real. And I found my heart beating faster just holding it and looking at it. I was very proud of it and I was getting excited. My daughter is fourteen and she says 'Dad that's really great that you still get excited about this,' and I said 'of course, this is what I do and it's so important.' So yeah, I'm up! My juices are flowing."

BH – You're once again working with Zakir Hussain. Everything I've read and heard about him is pretty impressive.

MH – "Impressive is a good way of putting it because he's the maestro. He's probably the most advanced rhythmist on the planet. It's about as good as you get."

BH – I read that his father, Ustad Alla Rakha, was a great percussionist. Did you know his father and is he still alive?

MH – "His father passed on but his father was my teacher and responsible for much of the rhythmic dexterity that I brought into the Grateful Dead. That was his dad's influence."

BH – Tell me about Sikiru Adepoku and Giovanni Hidalgo who are such integral parts of this recording.

MH – "Sikiru is like Zakir's counterpart only from the world of Latin percussion. He's kind of a deity in that world as Zakir is in Indian classical music. They're considered in that realm. There are the great professionals and then there are guys like Zakir, Sikiru, and Giovanni. Their technique and their prowess and their ability on their instrument are beyond comparison. As far as humans go, that's the most advanced you'll hear."

BH – Mickey when I was preparing for this interview I went back and listened to some of your previous work. With "At The Edge" and "Planet Drum" I thought you had more of a lush sound and you incorporated sounds of nature in those recordings. I thought "Supralingua" was a more aggressive record. But I think "Global Drum Project" is more melodic and hypnotic with a softer tone. Do you agree?

MH – "Yes that's very perceptive. That's what we were going for. We were going for the trance. We were going for the zone. We were going for the feeling that we've been nurturing all these years. All those CD's just kind of built to this. It's a logical progression if you listen to all of the work that Zakir and I have done and Giovanni and Sikiru. This is a perfect version of 2007 of us and what's going through our veins."

BH – What's the writing process like within the group? How do the songs come together?

MH – "Well it varies. Usually one of us initiates some kind of rhythmic statement, some kind of an idea. And then the others join in and it becomes a collaboration. This one was mostly created by me and Zakir because we live close by and Giovanni and Sikiru are all over the world. So it was mainly composed by Zakir and me. And we really love each other and trust each other and it's kind of a meeting of cultures and minds and souls and hearts. We have a certain common feeling that emerges when we play together. Zakir could start something or I could start something and bring it to him. It's like 'what do you think of this?' 'OK, how about that?' I like to keep it real loose in that respect, creatively speaking."

BH – Let's talk about the tour. You played the Gathering of the Vibes in Bridgeport recently but that wasn't with these guys was it?

MH – "I got two bands I work with. One is a western kind of song band with lyrics and rock and roll and that's the band that played the Vibes. Global Drum Project didn't play the Vibes. We played a tryout tour earlier this year just to check out this new technology. We did about ten shows on the west coast but that's as far as we took it. We just wanted to take it out on a maiden voyage just to see how it would go because this is very complicated technologically, this band. It's very advanced. We're using extreme techniques that normally are reserved just for the studio. We're doing it live in real time. Surround sound and spatial processing that we've never really attempted, and I don't think anyone has ever attempted live. So we just didn't want to go out on a national tour and we didn't have a record then. Of course we have the CD so we're going out on a more extensive tour, a six week tour."

BH – In Connecticut you'll be playing at a spectacular venue called the Jorgensen Center for the Performing Arts on the UConn campus. Are you picking venues that best compliment your sound?

MH – "These venues are state of the art venues that sound really good because it's a real challenge because there are acoustic instruments mixing with electronic instruments. So you have one foot in the archaic world of percussion, drums, membranes, and the other foot firmly planted in the electronic zone. So the band is a fusion in that way and also culturally. You know between us we got about two hundred and fifty years percussive experience in this band. This band is very unique in that way because we're all basically percussionists. And we're bringing it all together to make music that people can dance to and people can appreciate. It contains much more melody than we've ever had."

BH – How's your work been coming along with the American Folklife Center at the Library of Congress? I know you've been actively involved with digitizing and preserving the Center's vast music collection. Is that something that could ever be completed?

MH – "It will probably never be completed. It's a race you can never win. But you're going to run as hard as you can because there's so much music to be digitized. It's only so fast that the capable staff at the Library of Congress can complete the task. I mean there are many different mediums on which we've recorded sound and they're decomposing. So you have to grab them off of that medium and digitize them before the originals decompose. So that's what my main mission at the Library is."

BH – It's been over four years since the publication of your book "Songcatchers." Are there any new book projects in the works?

MH – "Yeah I'm always working on projects and I'm always working on books but right now I'm trying to focus on performance. I'm getting back to the need to play and the need to drum. There's a time for research and writing and then there's a time to get out and make rhythm. So this is that cycle. It goes in cycles."

BH – The tour isn't really that long. Have you thought about what you'll be doing when the tour ends? Will there be another tour?

MH – "We'll keep going out. I assume this tour will be very successful. The CD is good music. People love the CD, the people who have heard it and are starting to review it. It will be very successful. Any date on the stage with Zakir and Giovanni and Sikiru is a good day for me. It's a high point in my life. I'm really close to these guys. We really share similar visions and it's an honor to be in the presence of these great drummers. You couldn't get any better if you're going to pick drummers to play with. This is the all-star team. This is the Olympics!"

BH – I'm sure they say the same thing about you Mickey.

MH – "Well they're in their own class and I really respect them tremendously. We all do what we do well. And there's no real competition in that respect. Everybody is very secure in whom they are and everybody really loves each other. We all like each other. We get along. We laugh our way across the country. We play our way across the country. We drum in the bus going down the road and we just really enjoy each other's company. So what that makes for is group mind. And once you have group mind and you have the skill at this level – kick back! Now you're pushing the envelope. You're talking about new music and that's what I'm really interested in. I'm not interested in recreating another version of Grateful Dead music. I'll play Grateful Dead songs in the other band, the Mickey Hart Band, and enjoy it from time to time. But I don't want to spend the rest of my life covering Grateful Dead songs."

BH – You always seem to be looking ahead. You've been that way for as long as I've known you.

MH – "I don't want to plunder the Grateful Dead music or anything like that. I've done it so well back when I did it. For me it's kind of like breathing fumes as opposed to nectar. I remember how it used to be in the Grateful Dead. We all used to look at each other and say 'yeah tonight I really learned something. Boy that was really great.' And that's what happens with this band. You come off the stage and you learn something. Everyone is each other's teacher. And it's new and exciting. My relation with Zakir goes back to 1971 when he was a kid. And Giovanni and Sikiru 1990 from the original 'Planet Drum.' So we've put on a lot of miles and there's been a lot of rhythm shared between us over the years. And it tells as the performance happens because a lot of this is improvisational. There is composition so you will recognize the songs of course. But none of us are studio musicians. We don't play other people's music necessarily. And we don't play what somebody else wants us to play. We're not for hire in that kind of way. So it's a very free spirit that you feel on the stage and that makes for magic. You see everybody here – Zakir, Sikiru, Giovanni, they're soloists. They go out and have their own magnificent solo careers all over the world. But this group, they've agreed to come together to create a groove, a feeling, an energy together as opposed to the maestro solo thing. There will be solos but that's not what this vehicle is all about. If you want to see that you could see Zakir do his solo concerts, they're magnificent but this is not like that. Or Giovanni when he plays in his master's series but this is not that. And so you won't be hearing tabla solos all night. You won't be hearing conga solos all night or drum solos all night. But you'll be hearing deep drumming grooves all night and you'll be going into the zone with us I hope. That's what I've always liked. I've always like the ensemble. I always loved the groove. When you can get a bunch of guys that have the same mindset you just go with it. I feel very fortunate to be part of this."

BH – It's certainly nice to hear such excitement in your voice. For an old deadhead like me it's nice to see that Phil Lesh and Bob Weir are also doing well with their bands. It looks like everything has turned out ok.

MH – "Yeah it's really beautiful that we can all realize our musical destinies because that's what brought us together, this fierce need to create music. In that respect it's similar. The three of us are going out there trying to realize our dreams. And we had a dream called the Grateful Dead and it was a great dream. It became a great reality but that's over now."

BH – I also find it amazing that when I see you in October I'll be sitting in an audience where the majority of fans are too young to have ever seen Jerry Garcia. Isn't that amazing?

MH – "It is amazing and I don't take it lightly but that really just tells you the power of music, of Grateful Dead music and Bob Hunter's lyrics and all of our energies coming together in some cathartic way. Once you know how to do that you can do it somewhere else. It's not impossible. From time to time it happens to all of us, Phil's band and Ratdog, that we get that great feeling. You know there might be a time when we come together again but right now I think our own personal destiny is right there in front of us and I can't deny it. I just love this thing so much playing with Zakir, Giovanni, and Sikiru and I'm almost blinded by it. It's very hot."

JOHNNY CASH

"Personal File"

Columbia Legacy Records

"American V: A Hundred Highways"

Lost Highway Records

Grace. Grit. Greatness.

Johnny Cash, the American legend, hero and everyman, had those qualities, in spades, and they are more than self-evident in these two stunning posthumous releases.

Ironically, they showcase two entirely different eras of his career. "Personal File," catches a glimpse of the Man in Black at arguably the top of his musical game in the middle of his career. The tracks are culled from a treasure trove of audio tape recordings, from the early 1970s, found in hundreds of boxes stored in a private room behind Cash's Hendersonville, Tennessee home studio. Painstakingly reviewed, catalog and mastered by Gregg Geller under the auspices of Cash's son, John R., the results are like sitting in your living room, listening to the great man tell, strum and sing his stories. Indeed, many of the songs open with Cash talking about how they came about and where they were placed in his remarkable life.

"A Hundred Highways" is the other end of Cash's story. Recorded in 2003, born out of a need to work, having been widowed, his beloved June having passed, being quite ill and partially blind, and easily therefore in the most physically and emotionally demanding time of his life, Cash still did what he always did, told his stories and sung his songs, including his final recorded composition, "Like the 309," and interpreted the works of others, in a craggy, end of the road voice that, thankfully, uber producer Rick Rubin did not attempt to shine or sweeten in any way. Somehow, Johnny Cash was able to summon the strength to allow us to hear his suffering as still another chapter, another story, in his incredible life.

These are songs of redemption, of acceptance, and, yes, of death, yet, just like those in the "Personal File," they celebrate life and are a fitting testament to the legacy of the one and only Johnny Cash.

KEITH MILES

"What It Was They Became"

House of Trout Records

Is there an appreciable difference between a songwriter and a storyteller? Judging by this stellar release, if it's Keith Miles doing the writing, and the telling, it doesn't much matter.

Equal parts wry, homespun and just achingly truthful, combining the best elements of all writing and storytelling, sparkling from the crisp production work of Nashville's multi-talented and faceted Jack Sundrud, and bolstered by the astute playing of a number of Miles' musical pals, "Became" is a warm, smooth debut. In it, you will hear early echoes of Dylan's "talkin' blues" style, particularly with "Notichucky Idyll," which may be one of the great songs titles of all time, and a bit of Leon Redbone-inspired delivery, but, yet, it's altogether a very personal, individual sounding album.

Miles, by day having been a newspaper reporter, Congressional press secretary, and a partner in a Nashville public relations firm, has the perfect voice, not to mention the perfect touch and the perfect eye for detail, for telling, and playing, his stories. It's never too loud, never annoyingly cloy, only just about as good as it can be. Listening to this record is like having a good friend confiding in you, with beautiful descriptions, colors (yes, colors) and perfect orchestration to guide you. It's a little bit blues, a dash of folk and country, and just enough rock and roll to keep you tapping you feet a bit while your listen to Miles' spin his tales. And, if "Mason Dixon Line" isn't a hit in waiting, then I'll eat my cowboy hat.

If this record is any indication of what's in store musically for Keith Miles, it just might be time for him to quit that day job.

MUSIC NOTES

Danny Seraphine: Still Drumming With "Authority"

By Mark T. Gould

It's a safe bet that, for most music fans, the name "Chicago" connotes a mixture of mainstream, horn driven, radio-friendly pop music, consisting of power ballads galore. After all, songs like "Hard to Say I'm Sorry," "Saturday in the Park," "Old Days," "Baby, What a Big Surprise," "If You Leave Me Now," and a host of other middle of the road, AM-radio ready-made hits made the band the second highest charting and selling American group behind only the Beach Boys.

That staggering achievement aside, there has always been another more original, and to many discerning ears, including mine, better and more soulful side to Chicago. Actually, even that is bit inaccurate, since it was the original incantation of the band, the precursor known as Chicago Transit Authority, that melded jazz to rock, with a guitar-driven, horn-based sound that was in equal turns unique, powerful, detailed and, most importantly for its fans, 180 degrees away from the music that produced most of the massive sales figures and radio play detailed above.

For my money, that original CTA, which started a staggering 40 years ago, defined the band's sound before it permeated into the hits machine in the 70s and 80s. Frankly, the only other group playing that kind of music in those days was the Al Kooper version of Blood, Sweat & Tears.

And, now, thanks to the care and talent of CTA original founding member and drummer Danny Seraphine, that sounds lives again for its fans, through his recently-formed "California Transit Authority," whose debut release, "Full Circle" stands witness to the influence of this powerful drummer's legacy in melding jazz to rock, and, if there's any justice, that genre's future in American popular music. It's a recording that literally jumps out of the speakers at you, grabbing you, and making your shake and bake to its wonder.

Much like the original Chicago Transit Authority did, which, Seraphine said, was not a fluke.

"I wanted (the new band) to continue in the vein of that original Chicago Transit Authority sound," the 59-year-old Seraphine, who looks 15 years younger, said in a recent interview. "I want us to carry that torch of jazz-rock. I get inspiration from those days, and I'm quite proud of the body of work, particularly Chicago I to XI."

The initial popularity, and challenge, of Chicago Transit Authority came at a very heavy price, with the accidental death, in 1978, of co-founding member guitarist Terry Kath, a powerful and emotionally charged, yet at times understated, player and vocalist, whom Seraphine had worked with since their teenage days. Ironically, Chicago sold many, many more records after Kath's passing, but the mood, and perhaps the meaning, was never the same, according to Seraphine.

"His death was devastating, and, to be honest, the band was never the same," he said. "There were moments of greatness, but losing Terry was like losing an arm."

Despite the loss of a close friend and co-founder of his band, Seraphine managed to regroup, and actually forged the new Chicago sound and focus, by simultaneously convincing studio whiz David Foster to produce the group and famed Eagles manager Irving Azoff and partner Howard Kaufman to manage and market it, all while hiring keyboardist/guitarist/vocalist Bill Champlin to fill out the sound after Kath's death.

It was for Seraphine, though, a double-edged sword. The change in the group dynamic, while fostering (no pun intended) dramatic commercial growth, also played a big part in the departure of Seraphine from the band, in early 1990.

"It really did both," Seraphine remembered. "We were emotionally, spiritually and creatively zapped (before the changes). Foster injected new life to a lifeless band. He got us focused and back on our feet. Irving and Howard were just what the band needed. They are the best managers in the business and Irving is probably the best of all time, in my opinion."

But, as it turned out, it wasn't all positive.

"Champlin was brought in to fill the void that was left when Terry died, and he (Champlin), along with (bassist) Jason (Scheff) was instrumental in ousting me," Seraphine remembered.

Amid acrimony and accusation, Seraphine was dismissed during a tour of the United Kingdom, ultimately replaced by Tris Imboden. Yet, despite being banished from a group and a signature sound that he helped create and nourish, Seraphine clearly relishes focusing not on the past, but his future, with the equally powerhouse California Transit Authority.

"Honestly, these days I'm keeping my eyes out of the rear view mirror, and focusing on all the positives that are happening as a result of CTA and my life moving forward," he said.

And, armed with such an incredible impact on popular music in the late 20th century, Seraphine clearly wants to build on that pedigree with California Transit Authority.

"The goal is to get this music out to the masses, without ever compromising the integrity of the music," he said, "and that I haven't accomplished yet."
